President Alexander J. Campbell of the New London Business Men's association inquired of Mr. Gagel whether it would be feasible to change the present drawbridge into one of the lift type. Mr. Gagel answered that such a change would be entirely feasible and would be done if the state or city decided to retain the structure as a highway bridge. Whether both bridges would be operated by one control station would depend entirely on who owned the present bridge and whether such a course would be economical or advisable. "The new bridge," said Mr. Gagel, "is similar to the Connecticut river bridge and is of the same width.
